A general definition of an affiliate program is simply a program that allows webmasters to display ads on your website and receive a portion of sales generated by sending traffic to your site. So if Joe webmaster puts an ad on your web page for your product and a hundred people click that ad and go to their site and three people end up buying your product, Joe will earn a percentage of the money you make such sales. At the end of each month, we'll send your check Joe.

A large aspect of affiliate marketing campaign is that you pay for advertising is effective only if paid to members only after receiving payment for sales. You can, believe it!

Initial cost is usually under a couple of hundred dollars. This is to buy the affiliate software and install it on your server. This is a cheap way to start and also has advantages over the other option of joining an affiliate network.

There are some great affiliate program networks that charge five thousand dollars or more to join and integrate into your site to your network and expose it to its base of thousands of potential members. This is a tempting way to spend five grand and it makes sense that exposure to affiliates will be worth the large set-up fee. But unless your site is truly unique, you'll also be strong competition within the network. Because of this, every time you hire a valuable member who will join the network. It is very distracting and preferred not exactly.

This is the advantage of a separate program. The recruitment of members focuses on the program alone. Why spend so much money and so long to bring the members who are immediately directed to other programs as soon as they join?
